An advertisement offering employment at £4 per week to a respectable tradesman with red hair attracted the attention of James Wilson, pawnbroker. He secured the position in the offices of the Red Headed League. Suddenly the offices were closed and Wilson consulted Holmes. He explained that his assistant Spalding had drawn his attention to the advertisement. Holmes asked about Spalding, and ascertained that he had offered Wilson for hair-pay. He had a passion for photography, which often kept him in the cellar developing. Holmes had an idea it was not photography that was Spalding's hobby, and verified his suspicion that Ross, Wilson's former employer, and Spalding were digging a tunnel from underneath the pawnshop to the strong room of a local jeweller. The police were informed, and both premises surrounded. At eleven o'clock that night one of the flag stones in the strong room was pushed up and Ross and Spalding appeared. Both were captured.
